The Enemy

Your home may be host to millions of allergy-producing pollen, dust mites and pet dander particulates. Concentrations of many VOCs (volatile organic compounds), produced by paint, carpet, furnishings, smoke, cleaning supplies and animal odors can be up to 10 times higher indoors than outdoors. Even a spotless home contains airborne micro-organisms such as bacteria, viruses and molds.

They trigger your allergy symptoms: the itching, rough skin patches, watery eyes, runny nose and feelings of congestion.

When Coping Mechanisms Fail

If pet dander is triggering your allergies, your doctor may suggest you get rid of Fido. But the Centers for Disease Control states that owning a pet can lower: blood pressure, cholesterol levels, triglyceride levels and feelings of loneliness. Besides, if you're a pet owner already, this "solution" may be un-thinkable. And if you suffer from seasonal allergies or atopic dermatitis, while Fido may increase your symptoms, getting rid of him won't solve your problems anyway.

The next line of defense is taking medication or alternative health therapies. Either way, you're stuck constantly dosing yourself.

The Ultimate Answer

The ideal solution would be to eliminate all the particles that are triggering allergy symptoms in you or your pet. Of course, you can't very well live in a hermetically-sealed bubble, can you...or can you?
